THUNDERBIRD PILOTS
~MEMORIAL~

This memorial is a symbol of man’s love for his flying machine and the fond remembrances of the fellow pilots who shared in the joy of mastering the Stearman PT-17.<n
It stands as the mark they leave on the grounds of Thunderbird.<n No longer do these men wear a helmet & goggles, or stand on the lower wing of a biplane, or strap themselves into an open cockpit, or feel the blast of the prop on their face or breathe the burning exhaust of aviation gas.<n They were the last of this era of aviation history.<n An executive order committed the United States to build 50,000 planes and to train 100,000 pilots for war. The response to the training was answered by the civil aviation community, resulting in clearing a square mile of desert land to be known as Thunderbird Field, where flying began in 1941, ending with the war’s end in 1945.<n The students were military cadets. The airplanes were military PT-17s. The instructors known as the Thunderbird pilots, were civilians, flying more than one million hours to train over 16,000 cadets from the United States, Great Britain, and China.<n
